2023 has been a mammoth year for the food and drink industry, mirroring the peaks and troughs of society through financial hardship, political unrest, community togetherness and the prioritisation of wellbeing.

While the ebbs and flows of the nation continue, food and drink will always remain a great way to bring people together. The persistent rise of plant-based diets year on year, coupled with a new stronger wave of wellness in the consumer market, sheds a new positive light on the foodie community.

With this in mind, our favourite new tasty category is wellbeing. What fitness influencers were to pre-2020, supplements are to 2023, with consumers reaching for new ways to support their mental health, gut health and overall wellbeing beyond exercise and your '5-a-day'.

Exciting trends include the use of functional mushroom extracts for their adaptogenic properties that are more than just nutritional value, from brands such as Dirtea. Along with the rise in popularity for matcha, after viral TikTok's of where to get the best blueberry matcha, and surprisingly laid-back content from famous models such as Iris Law expressing passion for matcha tea; new habits are forming. Less people are reaching for a hard espresso in the morning, but instead for mushroom tea, superfood blends and natural-caffeine boosts of matcha.

As people, more than ever, strive for a well-balanced life there seems to be a rebellion against the hustle culture of pre-Covid. As the nation grinded to a halt and we were confined more than ever before, wellbeing was really thrust into the spotlight and it seems we have carried that idea through into our post-Covid world. More and more people, and brands alike, are shedding the idea that you must stretch your mental and physical limits to succeed within life, but instead embracing the 'soft-life' as coined by millennials as they choose a more stress-free way of living. This goes beyond wellbeing supplements, to plant-based products and the way in which we socialise.

We've expanded our vegan category with the influx of incredible quality vegan products now available, even making an appearance in our new pet category as more people look for healthier ways to treat their pets, thanks to brands such as W'ZIS? Meanwhile, our nights out have been amped up with more choice than ever before in how we spend our free time.

With a dose of nostalgia, experience spaces such as Fairgame in Canary Wharf are involving arcade and fairground style games to boost the appeal of going out to eat and drink with friends and family.

To bring it all back to our main driving force – our passion for food, drinks and the brands that impact our foodie community – we've put together our list of favourites that have listened to us. Concepts that have created solutions when needed and provided fun friendly spaces to let loose.

The food and drink industry is here to make you feel good, whether physically, mentally or socially, which is why we've added in some extra fun with our very first game. Get together with friends and family to play Tasty Trumps for a cheeky look at how we've rated our favourite new brands and discover what could be your favourites soon too.
